Governor names Voors commissioner of Department of Workforce Development

INDIANAPOLIS (September 14, 2007) – Governor Mitch Daniels today announced the appointment of Teresa Voors as commissioner of the Indiana Department of Workforce Development (DWD). She will replace Andrew Penca who is resigning to return to the private sector.

“We’re grateful Andrew interrupted a successful career to give three years to help develop Indiana’s workforce for today’s global economy,” said Daniels. “Teresa’s service since day one of this administration at DWD makes her a natural choice to assume this role as we continue our economic comeback.”

Voors, of Zionsville, currently serves as the agency’s deputy commissioner of strategic planning and policy as well as DWD’s chief counsel. Prior to joining the Daniels’ administration in 2005, she practiced labor and employment law at Baker & Daniels. Voors received her undergraduate degree from Indiana University–Purdue University Fort Wayne and her law degree from Indiana University–Bloomington.

Martin “Marty” Morrow, currently DWD deputy commissioner and chief information officer, will assume the role of chief operating officer for the agency. He previously worked for Eli Lilly and Company and founded several software companies. He received his undergraduate degree from Iowa State University and his masters in business administration from Purdue University.

DWD manages and executes employment programs and unemployment insurance systems for Hoosiers and facilitates regional economic growth initiatives for Indiana.

Voors’ appointment will be effective September 21.
